Some of the differences in religious practice between Christian and non-Christian immigrants no doubt reflects contrasting expectations about church going across religious traditions, not just individual differences in proclivities toward involvement. Once again, patterns of religious practice established prior to immigration carry over into the United States. Given the recency of arrival of most immigrants interviewed by the NIS, it is not possible to assess the frequency of service attendance in the United States using the same question that was used for attendance in countries of origin.
